In Sicily and Italy in 1943 the US Army began employing small teams of personnel known as Pathfinders on the drop zones intended for use in Allied airborne operations against the Axis powers The Pathfinders role was to set up their equipment shortly before the arrival of the first paratrooper laden aircraft over the drop zone in order to guide the aircraft to the proper location This early system met with mixed results Shortly after the US Air Force was established in 1947 it gained the Pathfinder mission from the Army but it was 1953 before the first Air Force combat control team CCT was formed chapter 1 For most of the 1950s the Eighteenth Air Force headquartered at Donaldson AFB South Carolina served as the nucleus for Air Force combat control However the USAF and even the Eighteenth Air Force leadership anticipated a not too distant future with electronic aids to navigation rendering the men on the ground unnecessary for guiding aircraft to their targets The small Air Force specialty survived the decade even as the US Army sought to recapture the Pathfinder function that it viewed as properly its own chapter 2 From the early 1960s to 1975 the Southeast Asia conflict gave CCTs their first combat experience furthering several legendary careers in the process chapter 3 In the wake of Israel s dramatic hostage rescue in July 1976 at Entebbe Uganda the US government began developing its own national counterterrorist capability At that point entered a hard charging charismatic and visionary combat control officer John Coach Carney whose small CCT played a key role in April 1980 at Desert One Carney s team almost certainly prevented a greater loss than what took place in the desert that night The failed operation s silver lining was the Pentagon s decision to develop joint special operations capabilities chapter 4 The brief Grenada operation in 1983
